Royals are comfortable with power. Whether they have earned it as Executives and Politicians, inherited it as Kings and Queens or are waiting to inherit it as Heirs, Heiresses, Princes, and Princesses, these are the people who are at their best exuding their regalness over the rest of us.

But not all Royals are alike. Some, showing the dark side of power, can be haughty and imperious as well as avaricious and paranoid, with the misplaced confidence that comes from never being questioned. Others can be noble and magnanimous with a naturally attentive demeanor and a tendency to struggle to make decisions that are for the good of others more than themselves. No matter how they rule, Royals always do so with great conviction.

The King

Kings don't just create wealth for themselves. They create it for others around them, including employees and investors. At their best they are role models for discipline, superb management, and the highest levels of strategic thinking.

The Queen

Queens are conveyors of grace, and they can use their position to do tremendous good in the world. They can lead as examples and empower others, women especially, to succeed.

The Politician

Politicians are people-oriented and great communicators. They know that to do their jobs well they have to be able to listen and collaborate.

The Princess/Heiress

Princesses can be inspirational figures for girls who lack confidence and dignity. And they can use their positions to do good, and to be spokeswomen for excellent causes.

The Prince/Heir

Princes can be agreeable friends, spouses and relatives because of their sense of ceremony and decorum. Like Gentleman, they are reliable guests, toast-makers and representatives of good causes.

The Diva

With their talent and tendency to dress to kill, Divas bring sparkle and fireworks to any situation.

The Vampire

Like Bram Stoker's Count Dracula, who fed on the lifeblood of others while living in a regal manner, Royals can be a drain on those around them.

The Prostitute

When it becomes so easy to take advantage of one's position, it takes a certain amount of discipline to fight the urge to debase the reputation of self and family.

The Brat

Because they are used to pampering and don't know how to do things for themselves, Royals can exhibit childish behavior in the form of tantrums and unreasonable demands.

The Destroyer

The Destroyer shadow manifests in vindictiveness and an unchecked fascination with wreaking enormous destruction on enemies.

The Thief

In addition to having access, Thieves who manifest themselves as Royal shadows are shrouded in elegant mantles of acceptability.

I'm definitely a King because I'm a role model for discipline, skills in management and leadership, and strategic thinking. I have the propensity for the shadow vampire and destroyer, but most people I team with consider me a fair, just, equitable leader. In my younger years, I cared more about achieving the goals than the people used to achieve them. As I matured, I realized the importance of the people working diligently to achieve those goals. First, a leader can't lead without followers. Second, a leader can't achieve goals without people. And, in today's world, people don't have to follow someone who hasn't earned their respect as a leader.

Can one manifest a shadow of an archetypal family without identifying with any of the archetypes of that family? Specifically, it could hardly be said that I am a Prince or Politician (or even Diva since I think Drag Queen/King fits into this), but I am a Brat. One of my nicknames in my family is "Baby Brat". Unfortunately, I fit the bill. I come from a working class family but I was the youngest of 5 and I was emotionally spoiled.
