In a nutshell, the scarab's high status in Egyptian belief was due its strong association with the sun. Another name for the scarab is the Dung Beetle, and one of its notable habits is rolling its own dung across the ground in order to form a ball, which was later used as an incubator for the beetle's young. The Egyptians saw the act of rolling a ball over a distance as analogous to the sun god guiding the sun across the sky, and the emergence of the beetle's young from the ball was emblematic of rebirth and regeneration, all related to solar symbolism.
